Constantinople, September 26, 1860. When Greece was in her infancy, and long before Eome had ever been founded, the coast of Syria was covered with magnificent and wealthy cities. On the north stood Aradus (the modern Eonad); eighteen miles to the south, Tripolis; at a similar distance By bios (Djebail), with the temple of Adonis; again, further south Berytus (Beyrout); at a like distance Sidon; and, finally, about fifteen miles further stood the Queen of the Waters, the stately Tyre. From the latter city arose commerce, civilisation, the arts and sciences, and, above all, that great instrument of social progress, the gift of letters. To its inhabitants, the Phoenicians, we are indebted for the knowledge of astronomy and arithmetic, as l well as for the discovery of weights and measures, of money, of the art of keeping accounts or bookkeeping; for the invention, or at least for the improvement, of ship-building and navigation, and likewise for the discovery of glass. They were also famous for the manufacture of fine linen and tapestry; for the art of working in metals and ivory; for their skill in architecture, and especially for the manufacture of that rare and costly article of luxury, the Tyrian purple. A new and formidable rival, however, at length competed with Tyre, and the trade of the latter became, to a considerable extent, transferred to that great city founded by the Macedonian conqueror. Nevertheless, when subsequently reduced to...
