Excerpt: . . . poetic spirit demanded by lofty themes. His battle scenes are much better; and in the historical field he rendered a notable service to art, by turning away from the conventional method of portraying heroes, of every period, in Greek and Roman garb. Soon after the capture Of Quebec, he planned to paint the death of Wolfe, and when it was rumored that he was to clothe the soldiers in modern uniforms, instead of classic togas, efforts were made to dissuade him from such mad defiance of convention. He explained to the King his conviction that the painter of historical events should show the costume actually worn, and that much would be gained, not lost, by truth of detail. When the Death of Wolfe was finished, Reynolds, who had earnestly opposed the idea, said West has conquered. The bold innovation revolutionized historical painting. His wives brother was a violent man, intensely opposed to the marriage; and on receiving Wests letter arranging for the voyage, promptly locked Miss Shewell in her room. There was nothing to do but elude him; and the adventurous matter was carried through by a remarkable trio of Wests friends, --William White, afterward first Bishop of the Episcopal Church in America, who was then a lad of 17 who said Ben should have his wife I; Francis Hopkinson, the signer of the Declaration, and Benjamin Franklin. Wests good old Quaker father chaperoned the bride on the tedious journey, and her cousin, the...
