Postponing, therefore, to some future opportunity the task of criticising a device which we must confess seems to us to be little better than a makeshift, we proceed at once to ask the questions, Is the Army Enlistment Act a measure sound in principle? is it wise in execution? is it consonant with the usages of the British army? and if, in any of these respects, it be defective, how best may the deficiencies be made good? Our readers will, of course, take for what they are worth the answers which we give to these questions; and if here and there what we put on record now seems to be at variance with certain opinions that were expressed in these pages by another writer not very long ago, they will farther bear in mind that the subject is a large one, and that only the individual who undertakes to discuss it can be held responsible for the soundness or unsoundness of his views. Reversing the order...
